San Carlos Apache Reservation, Arizona

Our second photo essay location is the San Carlos Apache Reservation. This famous elk location encompasses nearly 3,000 square miles in three of the top trophy producing counties in Arizona. Graham, Gila, and Pinal counties combined, account for 225 accepted entries into the Boone and Crockett Records Program, though it isn't just elk. A search through the records for these counties will reveal pronghorn, black bear, cougar, Coues' whitetail deer, mule deer, desert and bighorn sheep, and of course American elk trophies.

With the species present, it is obvious that this reservation covers most every type of topography and plant cover type that a hunter could desire from Arizona. With elevation from 2,000 to nearly 8,000 feet and a transition from Sonoran Desert to alpine forests including everything in between, the reservation has excellent habitat for all the previously mentioned species and the entries prove their management is top notch.

While the price of a tag for some of the top elk producing units can be a bit astonishing, some of the less known trophies available on the reservation are comparable to a similar hunt in many locations in the west for a non-resident hunter. Throw in the possibility of birds and javelina and it proves that most any hunter, regardless of budget, can consider a hunt on the San Carlos.
